A quartet of carolers performed 31 Christmas carols and well-known songs at Divine Mercy Church on Dec. 21.

The organization began in 1977 by four friends wanting to perform madrigal music and has evolved into an ensemble of performers in small groups of four or five people.

The groups performs throughout the Kansas City area.

County mental health crisis line team moves to bigger space

On Dec. 12, county officials celebrated Johnson County Mental Health Center's crisis line move to a bigger, more equipped space for emergency calls.

The new space at the County Communications Center, 11880 S. Sunset Dr., Olathe, can withstand an F-4 tornado and is next door to the 911 dispatch floor.

The crisis line receives an upgrade to the infrastructure and technology supporting the mental health crisis lines with additional workstations for growth over time, county officials said.

"Today is a special day," Commission Chair Mike Kelly said. "We get to celebrate the good work that is being developed and continues to grow the resources available to help those most vulnerable in our community."

Kelly said the 9-8-8 Suicide and Crisis Lifeline is a crucial service for the county.

"Not only is it another opportunity for those who need help to get that help, but it is an opportunity to help those that are already in this building--those 911 dispatchers," he said. "Providing resources and collaboration, so that the folks in Johnson County can get the best help that they can get."

Kelly said the county can make sure the resources can get to people in need as quickly and efficiently as possible.

"We have continued to face the rising challenge of mental health issues in Johnson County, in the State of Kansas, through out the metropolitan region," he said.

Kelly said the 9-8-8 crisis line service has already helped so many people facing a mental health crisis.

"More than 40,000 calls were answered last year," he said. "We are sure that that number is going to continue to rise. So now that 9-8-8 has a home here, it can be a home for the 14 full-time employees and 16 additional employees that are going to help on an as needed basis."

County officials said the new space provides room for the crisis line team to grow as call volume continues to increase in Johnson County. The team answered over 41,000 calls in 2022, up from 17,000 just five years prior in 2017.

Kelly said those numbers seem high for the county.

"But then you recognize the pandemic was tough," he said. "The scars of the pandemic continue to effect people; not only the physical scars but the emotional scars that have lasted from the pandemic. So we recognize that. Mental health services is a crucial service. It is going to continue to become even more crucial as people accept help. We know the need has always been there, but now as we continue to release that stigma as a community, we are going to see more people are going to be willing to accept the service."

Kelly said he was proud of the county providing another mental health resource for residents and the county is working on best the collaboration between 9-8-8 and 911 responders can evolve.

Kelly said having 30 people staff the 9-8-8 line will be helpful in saving lives in Johnson County.

"We are so proud of that," he said.

Kelly said the county is proud of the collaborative efforts of the Johnson County Mental Health Center, Johnson County Dept. of Emergency Services, the Johnson County Sheriff's Office and the Johnson County Administrative and Manager's offices.

"We know the challenges are going to continue," he said. "I am glad that our mental health department is a certified mental health center and is able to provide primary services, as well as mental health services. Continuing to find ways to partner, collaborate, innovate. To be able to help those in Johnson County who need that care."

Kelly said it is important the county prioritizes having space for mental health services.

"The idea that we have folks that are dedicated to this mental health service, this mental health counseling, this mental health crisis intervention right at the front end of a phone call, it is incredibly important to us," he said. "This is a great step in the right direction, and obviously not the last step we will take. I hope that we will continue to work not only here in Johnson County, but the metropolitan region to prioritize texting for 9-8-8 and continue to innovate and evolve--be able to meet people where they are, where they are willing to accept help."

Kelly said making the call is tough.

"The easier we can make it for folks, the more lives we are going to save," he said.

Kelly said it is important for the 9-8-8 crisis center to have a permanent location because when there is an opportunity for them to be a better resource for 911 responders the proximity will be beneficial.

Director of Emergency Services Paul Davis said the day was a celebration and milestone toward a "collective journey toward a healthier and more compassionate Johnson County."

"I am pleased we gather here today as we mark the opening of the 9-8-8 call center in the county communications center--a significant step forward toward prioritizing mental health in our community," he said.

Davis said the establishment of the 9-8-8 call center signifies more than just the addition of three digits to the county's response system, but it is a "beacon of hope, a lifeline for those facing mental health crises in our county and moving from awareness to action."

"Today we come together to underscore the vile importance of having a dedicated mental health crisis line in Johnson County and a collaboration with emergency responders, law enforcement, personnel in the call center--just as we have already established in the field setting," he said.

Federal infrastructure dollars sent to more Kansas communities for improvements

By Rachel Mipro
Kansas Reflector

TOPEKA — Around $8.3 million will be divided across nineteen Kansas communities for road safety improvement projects, Gov. Laura Kelly announced Wednesday.

“Safer roads mean parents can commute to work faster, businesses can get goods to market at lower cost, and tourists can get out to explore Kansas,” said Kelly. “I applaud our local communities for seeking this funding to improve their local roads.”

Money comes from the federal Safe Streets and Roads for All program, which provides 80% of project costs to the local government’s 20% match.

The five-year program, funded by the Bipartisan Infrastructure Law, is overseen by the U.S. Department of Transportation, and is geared toward promoting responsible driving and safer road designs, among other objectives.

The Kansas Department of Transportation also started a pilot program to contribute funding to the local match mandate.

The program has led to almost $14.8 million in federal funding for Kansas communities, with 38 Kansas communities successfully applying. Three million in state contributions have gone toward road improvements, along with $743,000 in local match contributions since the program began.

“Each time a step is taken to improve safety in a community, it’s a step in the right direction,” said KDOT secretary Calvin Reed. “KDOT is happy to support safety-conscious investment decisions. State and local partnerships like this help us compete nationally for Federal funds and bring critical investments to Kansans.”

In this round of funding, Gray County received $800,000 in federal funding to develop a new safety plan, and the North Central Regional Planning Commission received $1.5 million for a regional safety action plan, among other grants.

Kansas business owner charged with selling aviation tech to Russia pleads guilty

By Rachel Mipro
Kansas Reflector

TOPEKA — A Kansas businessman faces up to 25 years in prison after conspiring to sell and export aviation-related equipment to Russia, a scheme that allegedly began in 2020 and continued through Russia's invasion of Ukraine.

Sixty-year-old Cyril Gregory Buyanovsky, the owner and president of KanRus Trading Company Inc., pleaded guilty Tuesday to federal criminal charges. He's accused of conspiring to commit crimes against the U.S. and conspiring to illegally launder money.

His sentencing hearing is set for March 21. Assistant U.S. Attorneys Scott Rask and Ryan Huschka for the District of Kansas, along with a national security division trial attorney, are prosecuting the case.

"Buyanovsky admitted to a long-running scheme to smuggle sophisticated U.S. avionics equipment to Russia, doubling down to hide his actions after Russia's unprovoked invasion of Ukraine," said Assistant Attorney General Matthew Olsen of the Justice Department's National Security Division.

"Today's guilty plea demonstrates the Justice Department's commitment to cut off Moscow from the means to fuel its military and hold those enabling it accountable in a court of law."

Buyanovsky forfeited more than $450,000 worth of avionics equipment and accessories to the government, including a pallet of devices detained by U.S. Customs and Border Protection. He also turned over personal assets estimated to be worth about $50,000.

In his guilty plea, Buyanovsky said from 2020 to March of this year, when he was arrested, he had worked to smuggle U.S. avionic equipment to those in Russia and Russians in other foreign countries. To do so, he and fellow conspirators either didn't file required export forms, or filed false export forms in some cases, lying about export values, users and final destinations, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Former KanRus vice president Douglas Robertson, a 56-year-old Olathe resident, was part of the scheme, Buyanovsky said.

The two, along with others, continued to purchase and export equipment for Russian clients after Russia invaded Ukraine in 2022, despite tightened U.S. export measures. They did so, prosecutors allege, by shipping products through intermediary companies based in Armenia, United Arab Emirates and Cyprus and using foreign bank accounts to funnel money from Russian customers to the U.S.-based KanRus company.

Investigation into the years-long scheme was conducted by an interagency law enforcement task force dedicated to enforcing sanctions and export controls set after Russia's invasion of Ukraine in February of 2022.

The ongoing task force is still combating "efforts to evade or undermine the collective actions taken by the U.S. government in response to Russian military aggression."

"After the Russian invasion of Ukraine, the U.S. government imposed export controls and sanctions to prevent the weaponization of U.S. manufactured technology against Ukraine in a conflict intended to usurp its right to sovereignty within its borders," said Kate Brubacher, attorney for the District of Kansas. "As long as there are people who value greed and profit over freedom and justice, the U.S. Department of Justice will remain vigilant and investigate and prosecute these crimes."

HEALTH

Davis said he wanted to give credit to the Johnson County Mental Health Center for their "tireless efforts in championing for mental health awareness and support" and working the endeavor into action.

"Their commitment to breaking down stigma, providing resources and fostering a culture of empathy has laid the foundation for a successful program through all aspects of services to their clients," he said.

Davis said together the county is creating a community where mental health is a priority and help is readily available to those who need it.

Davis said the vision and leadership from various county officials in all departments has been instrumental.

"It is through their vision, dedication that the mental health programs provided in the county are successful, and the 9-8-8 call center in this building is now a reality," he said. "We are grateful for their tireless efforts in making our community safer and a more supportive place for everyone."

Davis said mental health is an integral part of the overall health and well-being of everyone.

"Everyone deserves access to timely and compassionate support," he said.

Deputy Director of Emergency Services for Johnson County Mental Health Center Renee Van Meter said the Sheriff's Dept. welcomed them with open arms.

"It has gone off, really without a hitch," she said.

Van Meter said this moment is a "mile marker."

"It is a mile marker of innovation, innovative mental health services, innovative crisis response, innovative collaboration, right here in Johnson County, Kansas," she said.

Van Meter said the new space allows the mental health center to have a seat at the table of a really important conversation.

"Is there a way to get the right response to the right person at the right time," she said. "And sometimes that might not be police or fire or an ambulance, and sometimes it is."

Van Meter gave a tour of the 988 crisis line room adjacent to the Sheriff and Med Act dispatchers.

Van Meter highlighted the building's infrastructure, specifically a wall.

"The infrastructure of this building is profound," she said. "This is a hard wall. All of the floor, all of the emergency responses happening behind this wall which is built to withstand an F4 tornado. That is huge in this land where we answer these calls and respond to crisis in our county. Behind this is where all of the work happens, and we feel safe, and we feel secure."

Van Meter said the new space provides more work spaces for future Johnson County Mental Health Center employees as they expect to grow with the call volume increase.

"We had four call stations in our previous call center, we were even smaller before that, so just planning for growth as our call volume has gone from 17,000 in 2017 to over 40,000 in 2022. We are on par to hit that in 2023. We know that growth will happen."

Van Meter said they also want to get into the field of chat and text, and the bigger room will let them respond to mental health crisis calls better.

Van Meter said the room is staffed four people deep from 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. and three staff from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. every day of the year.

Van Meter said the number of calls per day "depend on the moment."

"If you want to take an average of 40,000 (calls) throughout a year, it is 110 crisis calls a day," she said. "We know that doesn't happen. We know some days it is 210 and some days it is 50. But we are staffed here to respond to the county's needs as the county has told us that they need us."

County officials said sharing a building will also allow the county's 911 dispatchers and mental health professionals to share resources and collaborate more closely and efficiently, which is a first step toward a more formal connection between the two.

Johnson County Mental Health Center Director Tim DeWeese said they want to make sure they're providing the right service at the right time for anyone in our community who's experiencing an emergency or crisis.

"As a county, we're working together to ensure mental health crisis response is a part of that conversation alongside police, fire and EMS," he said.

County officials said over time, the goal will be to implement a 911 diversion program in Johnson County that would allow 911 calls to the County Communications Center to be transferred directly to the crisis line team when it is safe to do so. Such a program could be a model for other jurisdictions regionally and nationally looking to implement a similar connection between the two services.

The 988 Suicide and Crisis Lifeline is a national resource providing around-the-clock mental health support and was launched July 2022.

Those in need of mental health support for themselves or their loved ones are encouraged to call JCMHC's crisis line, 913-268-0156, or 988 to connect with a local mental health professional who will listen, support, share resources and provide guidance.
